The same terms were employed, without the word negligently, in the request to charge in the case of Coleman v. Second, Avenue Railroad Company, 114 N. Y. 609, and it was held error to refuse the instruction. in that case there was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff had been crowded. from his seat and was passing around on the side step of the open car in search of another. It was a question in that case whether the exposure to danger was voluntary and unnecessary. There probably was no question about it in this case, but it is not for the plaintiff to complain that the question was submitted to the jury. In the case of Colenrm, supra, the familiar rule was reiterated that if passengers without reasonable cause leave the car or place themselves on the outside of it when in motion, they assume the hazards of so doing, citing numerous authorities to that effect, and the term without reasonable cause is treated as substantially equivalent to the term voluntarily and unnecessarily. Under the authorities to which reference is made, we can have no doubt that the instruction to which exception was taken was one to which the defendant was entitled. The judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed. Lnwrs and Huonr, JJ. , concurred. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed. N0rrn. --See note to Kennedy v. City of Lansing, post. The plaintiff, while standing upon a running board of a...
