Three cases where extirpation was resorted to for the removal of chronic tumors in the spleen, are on record. Zaccarelli operated, in 1549, the wife of a Greek Onturio, suffering from opilation of the milt. That organ protruded through the wound made in the abdomen, was separated from its connection, and taken out. The patient recovered in twenty-four days. But the correctness of this case is doubted by almost all eminent surgical writers. The second operation dates back only to 1826. The patient, a woman, at the age of twenty-two, laboring under cirrhosis of the liver and ascites, had acquired a swelling of the milt, from suppression of perspiration and menses, irascibility, c. Tormenting pains in the tumor and the threatening dissolution, induced Dr. Quittenbaum to undertake the removal of the spleen. Carrying the knife along the linea alba to an extent often inches, he severed the ligamentum gastro-lienale, ligatured the vessels without regard to the nerves, and separated the diseased organ, which weighed five pounds. Six hours afterwards the patient died from exhaustion. We cannot approve of the operation in this instance, the hopeless condition of the patient having been evident to every one. The third case is the one related by Kuechler, in the work cited before. The tumor was fourteen inches in length, by seven...
