Excerpt: . . . not consider the influence of uncertainty or resource exhaustion in their investment decision models. In summary, economists appear to have taken two approaches to modeling firm exploration behavior. For the first approach, the number of prospects, labor, and capital services serve as inputs to the petroleum reserve production process called exploration. For the second, reserves are considered an input to the crude oil production process. Exploration is then regarded as similar to firm investment in physical capital equipment. To some extent, both approaches are correct, depending upon the nature of the firm under consideration. Firms engaged primarily in exploration regard discovered reserves as the end product, whereas vertically integrated firms might view reserves as inputs. Exploration can be regarded as an investment or input in the production of an inventory of reserves that results in crude oil production. As an intermediate product, reserves will undergo additional modification in the production process in order to generate final products. OPERATOR BEHAVIOR AT THE FIELD LEVEL With a few exceptions, the studies just reviewed have been concerned with modeling exploration behavior when data are highly aggregated. Frequently, data limitations necessitate such spatial and temporal aggregation. However, the testable behavioral hypotheses generated from these models are, in general, quite limited. In order to examine operator behavior, in more detail, data specific to the Denver basin are used in this study. In this area deposits were usually found in a single formation; the only exploration play that occurred during the period...
